INTRODUCTION

This is an up-date of the inventory which was first prepared by the Ministry in 1983-84. This inventory is intended to provide as complete a picture as possible of the current research and programming activities relating to Native people and criminal justice in Canada. In addition, the report includes a section on recording practices of the various components of the criminal justice system as they relate to racial origin.

An effort has been made to adhere strictly to the criminal justice area, but to be as eclectic as possible within that category. Accordingly, we have included not only research and programs aimed at Native offenders, but also those that are oriented toward diversion, policing, involvement of Natives in the criminal justice system as practitioners, and more.

The research and programs are listed together under the appropriate topic areas. Research that has been completed since the beginning of 1982 is included so as to keep the inventory as current as possible. The quantity of material also dictated the time framework. Proposed research and programs have also been included.

Because of the overlap between and among areas such as diversion, crime prevention and alternatives, the reader will note some overlap in this inventory. We have also singled out juveniles as a special area, so the research and programs often fall within more than one area.

The programs which are listed operate to aid Native people in all areas of the criminal justice system. Some of the programs that are included are short-term, summer projects which may or may not operate each year. Others are not permanently funded, but were operating at the time that the data were collected. In these cases, an effort has been made to indicate the expiry dates. However, even where there is an expiry date, programs may be extended by the funding agency. Also included are programs which are no longer being funded so that users of the inventory can see what kind of strategies have been tried in the past. Failure of the program to meet its mandate should not be inferred from the fact that funding was not extended.

The final section of the inventory relates to racial origin recording practices, as much of the current literature deals with the disproportionate numbers of Native people in conflict with the law in Canada. In order to determine the extent of this problem, it is important to know if, and how, racial origin is recorded, and how it is determined. An attempt has been made to present a comprehensive overview of the current situation in Canada.

There are groups of individuals with many different mandates involved in Native criminal justice research. The federal government funds projects which are conducted by other institutions and organizations as well as undertaking work own research divisions. Provincial governments are involved in the same way. Many universities and Native organizations are also doing research, as are other private sector groups and individuals. Graduate work within universities is another source of research activity.

Programs to aid Native people who come in contact with the criminal justice system, or to help them avoid involvement, are often funded by federal and provincial monies, but administered through Native organizations. These programs range from the Brotherhoods and Sisterhoods organized for and by Native inmates, to L'il Beavers, a youth crime prevention program run by a number of friendship centres across Canada.

Although considerable effort was expended on accumulating a comprehensive list of research and program activities, we realize that there are some we may have overlooked. There are also some sources with which we were unable to make telephone contact. We have tried to correct any errors or omissions that occurred when we compiled the original volume. We assume that we will be informed about any further omissions.

Our hope is to continue to up-date this inventory at regular intervals so that it will be possible for individuals and agencies working in the area to be kept abreast of activities at all times. In order to accomplish this, however, we will have to depend upon those sources to keep us informed of their activities and others of which they may know.

We hope that this inventory will continue to fill a void in the area of Native people and criminal justice and be of assistance to researchers, program developers and those involved in policy-making.

In reading the inventory, please note that we have not followed a federal/provincial/private sector breakdown but rather have listed research and programs within a criminal justice processing context. In addition, we have used a series of "special topics" in order to delineate the areas as discreetly as possible. Research is listed in chronological order. Proposed research is at the end of each section. Programs are first listed federally, then from west to east, and alphabetically by city within each province.

Description: The aim of this study was to determine why
Native persons are not applying to the Regina Police Service and to determine what steps may be necessary to assure that there is a representative number of persons of Native ancestry in the Regina service. The study includes a survey of attitudes of Native people about police work in general, and the Regina police service in particular. It also gives the experiences of other police jurisdictions that have attempted to recruit and hire persons of minority group background.

Time Frame: Dated June, 1983

Description: This report is a compilation of data from the evaluations on the Ontario Indian Constable Program, the Amerindian Program, the Dakota-Ojibway Tribal Council Police Program, and the R.C.M.P. 3b Option Program. The comparative analysis of the four program evaluations includes a review of the following types of issues: rationale/goals mandate; organization/operations; funding, jurisdiction, performance, training, effect on the community/community satisfaction, and impact on crime. The purpose of the overview is to provide information for an assessment of the performance of Indian policing programs across Canada. The report also suggests guidelines for future evaluations of Indian policing services. An executive summary is included with the final report.

Time Frame: Completed July, 1983

Description: The Calgary Police Service, as part of the process establishing guidelines for in-service training, conducted a survey of its members. The purpose of the survey was to determine possible prejudices held by personnel, and the extent to which such views were prevalent in the Calgary Police Service. This was seen as a necessary first step in developing programs aimed at combating racial prejudice. A brief questionnaire was administered to 175 police personnel who have the most frequent contact with the public. The results of the survey have been labelled confidential. However, it may be possible for interested parties to obtain the report following an assessment of individual requests.

Time Frame: Completed Fall, 1984

Native Policing Branch
Ottawa R.C.M.P. Headquarters
1200 Alta Vista Drive
Ottawa, Ontario
K1A 0R2
(613) 993-1126

Description: This program was started in 1974 by the R.C.M.P. in conjunction with the Department of Indian Affairs, to facilitate communication between the police and Native populations that they were policing. The purpose was to provide law enforcement that was more suited to the needs of the Native people. Special constables receive 16 weeks of training as compared to 24 weeks for regular constables. The requirements are slightly lower because of the lower levels of education that most Native people have acquired. Most Special Constables go back to work in their own areas once their training is completed, to serve a population with the same Native language as their own (although they will probably not work on their own reserves). They work mainly on reserves but also in the adjacent areas. It is possible for a special constable to take additional training and become a regular constable.

Description: This course is given to recruits during their six-month training course. It is also given to any officers who are being posted to the Yukon and Northwest Territories. It was originally set up to provide officers with an understanding of Native people, but has since been extended to include other ethnic groups, particularly in urban centers. The purpose of the program is to give the officers an understanding of how personality develops, and of the different aspirations, socio-economic conditions, and values of ethnic groups. It is intended to facilitate a better relationship between the police and the people they are policing. This course is also given to community workers, Native courtworkers, and social workers in some areas. Through this course, the R.C.M.P. is trying to help its members provide a policing service that reflects the needs of the community.

Description: This program is similar to the one that is given to R.C.M.P. recruits. Its purpose is to make police officers aware of the different aspirations, socio-economic conditions, and values of the various ethnic groups. It is intended to facilitate a better relationship between the police and the groups they are policing and to ensure that the services provided reflect the needs of the community. This training is given to police officers in Vancouver and Ottawa. Part of this program is a continuing study on recruitment and selection of minorities by police departments, inter-cultural training, and liaison between minorities and police. The first report is expected in August. In addition, a cultural training handbook will be published later this year. It will describe the program, provide guidelines for instituting similar programs, and indicate how it could be used and marketed. A set of video tapes describing the program are now available.

Vancouver, British Columbia
V6A 2T2
(604) 665-3358

Description: This program is designed to develop, maintain, and improve the relationship between the police and the Native community in Vancouver. The civilian workers ride with police in order to assist Native people who come into conflict with the police. They also come in contact with clients through self-referral, referral from government and social service agency sources, and through investigation reports. Another aspect of the program is aimed at diverting Native people from further conflict with the criminal justice system. The workers are also involved in program development, and referral of clients to social service agencies in the community. Community presentations are made by program workers on all phases of the policing process. The purpose is to explain the role, function, and responsibility of police to the community. Emphasis is placed on the service aspect of policing. The program compiles statistics from all police reports involving Native people. They are currently proposing to computerize this data.

(514) 395-4066

Description: This policing is provided under a two-phase agreement between the Quebec government and participating bands. In the first phase, the Quebec Provincial Police organize all police departments but after three years, the band councils take over the management of the financial affairs of the police departments. In the second phase, the responsibility for the policing will be split between the Quebec Provincial Police and the band councils for a further two years, and then the band will have total authority. All constables are trained at the Quebec Police Academy and this will continue for all new recruits even after the bands have full control of policing on their reserves. This program is available to any reserve in Quebec. At the present time, there are five Cree bands which are in the second phase. For example, the Mistassini Cree will become autonomous in 1985. At the present time, the Native constables only have authority on reserves. Later, they will have authority on lands which have been designated as category two and three under the James Bay Agreement. These are the lands which are hard to police. All recruits must be Native. They are sent back to their own reserves or settlements once their training is complete.

Description: This study provides information on the delivery of services, the perception that communities have of the juvenile court system, and the offence, offender, and dispositional characteristics of the Native and non-Native juveniles appearing before the court. The project consisted of four components: interviews with key actors; analysis of file data; court observation; and community typology and comparative data analysis component. Since Native, non-Native and mixed communities were selected, the latter component involves development of a community typology using a Native/non-Native dichotomy.

Description: In Yukon, there are three categories of Justices of the Peace. Level one JP's receive information, deal with search warrants and appearance notices, and perform weddings. In addition to these duties, JP II's can hear judicial interim release applications, and sentence offenders when they plead guilty to by-law or territorial offences and the Crown is seeking a penalty of not more than 15 days or a fine of not over $500. JP III's can hear all young offenders' cases, civil matters, and all by-law and territorial offences where the sentence sought by the Crown is a fine not in excess of $2,000, or a jail term not in excess of three months. There is an intensive training program which lasts three months. At the end of the training period, the justices move into an apprenticeship which lasts as long as required. At present, there are four Native Justices of the Peace-- three at level one, and one at level two. They do not deal exclusively with Native cases.

Description: At the present time, approximately 50% of all of the Justices of the Peace in the Northwest Territories are Native. All JP's have the same powers although some may choose not to hold trials. Since February of 1983, there has been a training program for the Justices to provide them with legal information. The Territories have been divided into five regions, and annual meetings are held in each of them. In January, 1985, a manual was completed to assist the Justices of the Peace in the performance of their duties. It is hoped that the number of Justices of the Peace will be increased in order to ease the case load of the circuit court.

Description: The purpose of the Ontario Native Justice of the Peace Program is to encourage and enable Native citizens to play an expanded role in judicial proceedings as justices of the peace. The program is open to status and non-status Indians and Métis and to both men and women. Although Native justices of the peace will be assigned responsibilities which utilize their cultural understanding, language skills, and life experience, they do not perform their duties solely in relation to Native persons. One of the goals of the program is an enhanced sensitivity in the courts to the distinctive cultural, legal, and socio-economic circumstances of Native people; a greater understanding of court proceedings among Native accused persons; and a greater appreciation and confidence among Native communities that the justice system provides for equal access to, equal rights before, and equal protection from, the courts.

Contact: Gail Williamson
Native Counselling Services of Alberta
5th Floor, Victoria Place
10009-108 Street
Edmonton, Alberta
T5J 3C5
(403) 423-2141

Description: This program provides people with legal information, counselling, and assistance in the juvenile courts of Alberta. Workers act as a liaison between clients, social workers, and the courts. They inform people of their legal rights, and explain court procedures to them. The courtworkers also assist juveniles in obtaining legal counsel.

Time Frame: On-going

See Native Courtworker Program entry for list of Native Counselling Services of Alberta branch offices.

Contact: Sylvia Maracle
Ontario Federation of Indian
Friendship Centres
Suite 203
234 Eglinton Avenue East
Toronto, Ontario
M4P 1K5
(416) 484-1411

Description: This program provides services, similar to those of the Courtworker program, to Native people involved in matters before the family and juvenile courts. Court procedures are explained and general assistance is given. The courtworker acts as liaison between the justice system and the Native people involved in it. Help with community services is also given. There is a particular emphasis on assisting young Native offenders.

Time Frame: On-going

D. LEGAL REPRESENTATION

RESEARCH

Title: IMPLICATIONS OF THE YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT/
ORDINANCE WITH RESPECT TO THE RIGHT TO COUNSEL
IN THE NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Author: Douglas Miller

Prepared for: Northern Conference on Justice, Yellowknife

Funded By: Not specified

Contact: Douglas Miller
Executive Director
Legal Services Board
Northwest Territories Department of Justice and Public Services
P.O. Box 1320
Yellowknife, Northwest Territories
X1A 2L9
(403) 873-7450

Description: The purpose of this report is to examine the provision for counsel under the Young Offenders Act from a legal perspective. A very thorough examination of this aspect of the Act is given. Brief comparisons are made to the practice of providing counsel under the Juvenile Delinquents Act. The right to counsel provisions are discussed in the context of the justice system available in the North. The author raises issues and concerns that are pertinent to all Northern youth, the majority of whom are Native children.

Time Frame: Dated March, 1984

XOA OHO
(819) 979-5377

Description: This is a legal aid clinic. It has an all-Native Board of Directors. The Centre has, in addition to legal counsel, a courtworker program. The primary purpose of the clinic is to assist indigent Inuit in legal matters. Seventy-five percent of their work involves criminal representation. They also train paralegal workers and are involved in community education. In 1982, they made an Inuit language movie on the criminal justice system in which they traced the process of arrest, pleas, etcetera. In the fall of 1983, a theatre group did a presentation to educate local people on the criminal justice system.

Upper Skeena Counselling and Legal Assistance Society
P.O. Box 130
Hazelton, British Columbia
VOJ 1Y0
(604) 842-5218

Description: This a Native community law office. It provides legal services to eight Indian bands, mainly those that make up the Gitskan Carrier Tribal Council. The majority of their criminal cases result from traffic, hunting, and fishing infractions. The Society, including the staff and the Board of Directors, is Native. They have one lawyer, and two legal information counsellors.

Time Frame: On-going

Name: NATIVE SECTION, BRITISH COLUMBIA LEGAL SERVICES SOCIETY

Funded By: British Columbia Provincial Government

Contact: Barbara Murphy
Native Section, Legal Services Society
555 West Hastings Street
Box 12120
Vancouver, British Columbia
V6B 4N6
(604) 689-0741

Description: The Legal Services Society provides legal aid to all people in British Columbia who are eligible. The Native section seeks to work with community groups who are dealing with the unique problems that Native people may have with the justice system. The Society funds Native community law offices. Each office is given sufficient funds for 1 lawyer, 1 or 2 legal information counsellors, and clerical staff. The Society has a contract with a local Board of Directors which establishes community priorities. They are required to provide a full range of legal services, both criminal and civil. In addition, they are given leeway to focus on any special problems that are affecting the Native population in their area.

Description: This is a computer-based classification system that collects data on all probation supervision cases in Manitoba. The admission document requests probation officers to describe whether a probationer is: 1) non-Native, 2) Native Canadian--Métis or non-treaty, 3) Native Canadian--treaty living on reserve, or 4) Native Canadian--treaty Indian living off reserve. There is also a record of the various reserves from which offenders originate.

Time Frame: On-going

Title: HANDBOOK FOR PROBATION OFFICERS

Funded By: British Columbia Attorney-General

Contact: Rob Watts
120-3408 Kalum Street
Terrace, British Columbia
V8G 2N6
(604) 638-3231

Description: This handbook is to provide probation officers with information about the ethnic background of the Native offenders with whom they deal. It will provide information on each major tribal grouping in British Columbia. It will contain a history of each group, cultural information, social structure, community politics and a description of land claims issues. It will be prepared through contacts with the various tribal councils.

Time Frame: Planned for the near future

PROGRAMS

Name: FINE OPTIONS PROGRAMS

Description: These programs provide offenders who are unable to pay their fines with an alternative to jail. Offenders perform supervised community service work. Programs are administered throughout sponsoring provinces by local, community-based agencies. In some provinces a large proportion of the clients of the programs are Native.

Description: The objectives of this program are to provide to the court a new sentencing alternative; to allow the Indian and Inuit communities to actively participate in the administration of justice; and to give to the offender the opportunity to make community reparation for the offence committed. To achieve the second objective, a committee of Native people has been created to make recommendations to the court when making an order.

Funded By: Consultation Centre, Ministry of the Solicitor General Canada

Presented To: Allied Indian and Métis Society
2716 Clark Drive
Vancouver, British Columbia
V5N 3H6
(604) 874-9610

Description: This feasibility study looks at the ability of existing institutions to address the over-representation of Native people in correctional facilities, and their ability to meet the needs of Native inmates. It examines the recommendations from the report of the Task Force on Correctional Services and Facilities published by the Department of the Attorney-General of British Columbia in 1973. Also included in the report are interviews with Native inmates, eliciting their opinions about what is required in a facility to best meet their needs.

Contact: Ontario Native Council on Justice

Description: The report reveals that over twice as many Natives are jailed in the District of Kenora for liquor offences than their share of the population would seem to warrant. Substantial numbers of Native people in the Kenora area are imprisoned for non-payment of fines for provincial liquor infractions. Because of this issue, and the persistent recidivism of Native liquor offenders in the area, the proposal for an Anicinabe Wilderness Camp project was developed. The specific objectives of the camp would be to offer a residential alternative to jail for liquor offenders in a traditional Indian natural environment. A program of work, education, counselling, recreation, and spiritual awareness would be designed to foster a greater sense of identity and self-worth, an increased awareness of cultural and spiritual roots, and an enhanced capacity to live and work without dependence on alcohol.

Description: The objective of this study was to discover the educational needs of Native inmates as perceived by education staff. Selected institutions were visited, and various program designs were investigated. Most of the information was obtained through interviews with education staff. The investigation included questions aimed at documenting special Native programs, an analysis of education programs which would be

(or have been) successful with Natives, and a profile of the teacher most likely to be successful with Native inmates.

Description: This study will have three phases. Phase One and Phase Two are descriptive and will provide information on current Native inmate programs. Phase Three provides the means for the development of an alcohol abuse program for Native inmates which would ensure consistency with Native peoples' concerns and cultural needs. Phase One is designed to provide a current inventory of programs available to the Native female inmate in Ontario and to provide an indication of the extent of the Native female inmates' participation in these programs. Phase Two is designed to provide a description of the current Native inmate self-help groups in Ontario correctional facilities and to describe the role of the Native inmate liaison worker in the self-help group. Phase Three is designed to develop the components of a Native alcohol abuse program for delivery to Native female inmates in Ontario.

Description: The purpose of the directive is to establish policy governing Native spiritual practices in institutions. It sets out the policy objectives and directs that a Native spiritual awareness program be established in each region to inform staff about the practices and sacred objects of traditional spirituality. As part of this awareness training, a kit has been prepared and distributed to correctional officers. It contains text explaining the ceremonies, their meaning, and their importance in Native culture, and pictures of the sacred objects to assist in their recognition. A film to assist in awareness training is being prepared.

Description: Mother Earth's Children is a camp with two components. The first is a children's camp for Native children ages 8-17. The children attend the camp for a one-week period during July and August. They are taught Native culture and counselled on drug and alcohol abuse and the value of education. The purpose of this camp is diversion and education. In the summer of 1985, all of the children participating were from the Dakota-Ojibway Tribal Council reserves, and funding was provided by the Council.

The second component is a 12-week program for Native youth from 15-24 years of age. They will be given life skills courses, Native culture courses, information on courts and law, and alcohol and drug abuse. They will also be taught the importance of an education, and of finding and keeping employment. The camp will continue where correctional institutions and probation programs finish. The administrator hopes to run three 12-week sessions per year.

The campsite, formerly a forestry camp, was provided by the Manitoba government. Room and board for participants in the 12-week program is paid by the provincial government on a per diem basis. Funding for administrative costs is still being negotiated.

Time Frame: Children's camp began in Summer, 1984. The first 12-week session is scheduled to begin in Fall, 1985.

Description: This project includes a halfway house, Newbury House, which is located at 288 Kingsmount Blvd., Sudbury, Ontario, and a 9,000 acre site 25 miles south of Sudbury. Newbury House provides accommodation for 10 Native ex-inmates, whether male or female. The residents of this house are involved in constructing buildings on the 9,000 acre site, which the project rents on a 20-year lease. The main objectives of the project are the development of self-sufficiency in an Indian community, and providing support to persons released from correctional institutions. The site will become home to ex-offenders and their families, as well as other Indian families. Many of these groups will be learning land skills--building their own homes, and becoming involved in small, land-based industries to support themselves. The project is intended to become a small, traditional, self-supporting community. Almost all of the leaders of the project are living traditional lives at the present time.

Time Frame: On-going, with full community expected to be established in about three years.

Title: AN ALTERNATIVE FOR RECIDIVISTS: REVISED PROPOSAL FOR AN ANICINABE WILDERNESS CAMP PROJECT FOR LIQUOR OFFENDERS

Description: The report establishes that over twice as many Natives are jailed in the District of Kenora for liquor offences than their share of the population would warrant. Substantial numbers of Native people in the Kenora area are imprisoned for non-payment of fines for provincial liquor infractions. Because of this issue, and the persistent recidivism of Native liquor offenders in the area, the proposal for an Anicinabe Wilderness Camp project was developed. The specific objectives of the camp would be to offer a residential alternative to jail for liquor offenders in a traditional Indian natural environment. A program of work, education, counselling, recreation, and spiritual awareness would be designed to foster a greater sense of identity and self-worth, an increased awareness of cultural and spiritual roots, and an enhanced capacity to live and work without dependence on alcohol.

Description: This project is a community action plan which will explore the scope of the problem of incarceration and recidivism in specific communities. Ex-inmates from the Batchewana Indian Band, familiar with arrests, court procedures, sentencing and the prison environment, will carry out educational workshops to help the re-integration of ex-offenders into the community, and to warn young people of the seriousness of becoming involved in the criminal justice system. They will form a resource group to counsel individuals who come into contact with the law, and their families. The project also plans to collect demographic information in an attempt to analyze the scope and impact of the problem of incarceration and the community.

Time Frame: This project has been approved for funding and will probably begin in late 1985.

Description: The Warriors in Prison Committee was formed in response to the high rate of incarceration and recidivism experienced in Native communities. The committee believes that there is a tendency to ignore the factors that contribute to criminal activity. The lack of appropriate community-based after-care programs to assist ex-offenders with re-integration into the community, and the strong negative bias against ex-offenders all serve to support the existence of the high incarceration and recidivism rates. To combat these problems, the Warriors in Prison Committee has a two-fold goal. One aspect is the education of the community about the factors that contribute to the high rate of illegal activity and the adverse effects of incarceration on an individual. The other is the development of counselling and support programs for persons experiencing difficulties with adjustment after a period of incarceration, and for youth who come into conflict with the law.

Description: This report presents a summary and review of 11 consultative papers related to the impact of the Young Offenders Act on Native youth. Most of the papers were written by Native organizations. The papers raise many issues and concerns currently being addressed by Native organizations, and a few present specific recommendations. Many of the issues and recommendations are specific to the Young Offenders Act, while others are more generally concerned with difficulties experienced by Native youth in this country. This report summarizes the issues and recommendations outlined in the consultative papers according to those that are specific to the YOA and those that are more general. Based on the information contained in the consultative papers, the authors of this report have developed a prioritized list of further research and program needs. An annotated bibliography on Native youth and the justice system is included.

Funded By: Manitoba Government

Administrator: Wally Swain

Camp Address: Mother Earth's Children
Box 960
Carberry, Manitoba
ROK OH0
(204) 725-3036

Description: Mother Earth's Children is a camp with two components. The first is a children's camp for Native children ages 8-17. The children attend the camp for a one-week period during July and August. They are taught Native culture and counselled on drug and alcohol abuse and the value of education. The purpose of this camp is diversion and education. In the summer of 1985, all of the children participating were from the Dakota-Ojibway Tribal Council reserves, and funding was provided by the Council.

The second component is a 12-week program for Native youth from 15-24 years of age. They will be given life skills courses, Native culture courses, information on courts and law, and alcohol and drug abuse. They will also be taught the importance of getting an education, and of getting and keeping employment. The camp will continue where correctional institutions and probation programs finish. The administrator hopes to run three 12-week sessions per year.

The campsite, formerly a forestry camp, was provided by the Manitoba government. Room and board for participants in the 12-week program is being paid by the provincial government on a per diem basis. Funding for administrative costs is still being negotiated.

Time Frame: Children's camp began in Summer, 1984. The first 12-week session is slated to begin in Fall, 1985.

Description: This project involved placement on a farm as a sentencing alternative for young offenders under the open custody legislation. The project's emphasis was on crime prevention. Project staff worked with youth on challenging and constructive farm tasks, and taught them Dene history and culture. The project was funded by the Ministry of the Solicitor General in conjunction with the Government of the Northwest Territories until March, 1984, when funding by the former expired. Since that time, the program has operated on funding from various sources until it closed down at the end of June, 1985. It is not clear when it will re-open as further funding must be found.

Time Frame: Currently in hiatus, but will probably re-open if further funding can be found.

Description: This report includes a social history of prostitution, the law as it is today and a description of prostitution. As there is a limited amount of available empirical data, this report is based mainly on secondary sources. Although it does not deal specifically with Native women, some data are presented because in certain areas this group is over-represented in arrests for prostitution.

Description: This paper examines some of the existing research literature which relates to Native women and the criminal justice system. It discusses findings from a number of other studies which address the situation of Native women in Canadian society. The purpose of this review is to highlight some of the most pertinent information about the needs of Native women, and to document those areas where more research and program efforts are indicated. This paper was published in the Canadian Journal of Criminology, Vol. 26, No. 2, April, 1984.

Description: This directory is a comprehensive listing of existing programs and services for women in conflict with the law in Canada. In addition, it includes information on the scope of existing programs and the range of clients served, the state of evaluations of programs and services, and service needs as identified by service providers. Programs which provide direct services are listed, as well as those intended to educate the public about women offenders, and information about groups that lobby on behalf of women in conflict with the law either on an individual or an issue basis. Although there is not a discreet section dealing with programs for Native women, they are included in the appropriate chapters which divide the programs by provinces. This directory has been released by the Ministry as a user report. It is available in French and English.

Description: Recently, there has been an influx of Inuit women into Montreal. Unfortunately, many of them come without the knowledge and skills to cope with the urban environment. Once support from previous arrivals is no longer forthcoming, many turn to prostitution to survive. The problem of prostitution among Inuit women in Montreal has attracted special attention because of its visibility and the stigma it attaches to Native women in general. This research would permit an assessment of its occurrence, the needs of the individuals concerned, and offer recommendations for possible solutions.

Description: The study focused on the conditions of Natives living in Native communities. This acknowledges a general perception that Native communities are often confronted with somewhat unique circumstances in dealing with the victims of crimes due to cultural, economic, social, and geographical circumstances. The report was based on a literature review and telephone interviews with persons representing government and non-government organizations which provide services to Natives and Native organizations across Canada. The study notes that Native crime victims cannot be considered as one homogeneous group. The recommendations made in the paper relate to the appropriate form for conducting Native crime victim research--research requirements and research techniques and methods.

Description: This is a discussion paper which was presented at the 1982 American Society of Criminology Annual Conference in Toronto in November of 1982. It looks at the idea of crime prevention as it occurred in traditional society, a society that, technically, had no crime as it is defined by the Canadian criminal justice system. There were, however, deeds of wrong-doing that led to remedial action. This work examines some of these deeds, considers why they were deemed wrong, and how they were prevented. It then examines briefly how this conception of justice fits in with the modern system and how the modern system could benefit from incorporating some of these ideas. The majority of the concepts are presented in the words of the elders from whom the information on the traditional systems was solicited.

Description: This report defines customary law and examines the social implications of non-recognition of Inuit customary law when developing a system of laws to govern Native people in the far north. The report also looks at the recognition of Inuit customary law in Canadian law and finds it to be very limited, confined primarily to family law issues, particularly customary adoption and marriage law. The author argues that this leaves a broad spectrum of Inuit customary law unaddressed by the courts, and until recently, by politicians. The report also makes recommendations for the incorporation of Inuit customary law into a legal system.

Description: This paper examines the implications for crime prevention programming that arose out of research that was conducted in Saskatchewan. The author argues that traditionally conceived crime prevention programs are unlikely to have much positive impact on Native people because they fail to take account of the nature and extent of Native involvement in the justice system and the underlying reasons for this involvement. Some relevant research findings about Native offenders in Saskatchewan are reviewed.

Contact: Dave Daniels
Tribal Administrator
702 Douglas Street
P.O. Box 322
Brandon, Manitoba
R7A 5Z2
(204) 725-3560

Description: The purpose of the project was to develop strategies to combat the high incidence of juvenile delinquency on the Dakota-Ojibway Tribal Council reserves. The project involved the collection of information through a survey to assess the scope and nature of the problem, and the development and initiation of programs which would aid in reaching that goal. Out of this project came the initiative for the probation program and a community college. The project was funded under the Summer Canada Works program.

Description: The destructive effects of alcohol and drug abuse have become a source of major concern to Canada's Native people today. The National Native Alcohol and Drug Abuse Program (NNADAP), represents the Federal government's response to this concern. In general, the objective of the program is to arrest the negative effects of alcohol and drug abuse by providing funds to Indian and Inuit groups and communities to enable them to undertake projects aimed at the prevention, treatment, and rehabilitative aspects of such abuse. The development and implementation of specific strategies to combat alcohol and drug abuse rests with the Native communities themselves. This report outlines some of the various approaches to the problem that the Native communities have taken.

Description: This report provides a critical assessment of available Canadian research literature on the impact of all components of the criminal justice system on Indigenous peoples in Canada. Existing explanations for the problems of over-involvement of Native people at major points in the criminal justice process, and proposed solutions to these problems, are scrutinized. The report identifies gaps in existing research and consequent policy implications for discriminatory laws, for police discretion, for legal services and for decision-makers who influence the nature of correctional dispositions for Indigenous offenders. The report is available from the Ministry in both English and French.

Description: The authors contend that close examination of developments in policy and the implementation of programs designed to increase Native participation in the criminal justice process reveals that Natives are often viewed as a homogeneous social and political group. They have, therefore, failed to consider the operational difficulties associated with implementing Native to Native structures. This paper considers the role of research and development of policy regarding Native communities, and makes suggestions for future research. The implications of the findings for criminal justice policy and for programs to deliver justice services to Natives is discussed.

Description: This paper was presented at the American Society of Criminology meeting in Toronto on November 6, 1982. This paper compares and critically examines the strategies which have evolved in both Canada and Australia at state/provincial and federal levels which take as their major reference point and objective the reduction of Native over-representation in prisons. Theoretically it locates analysis within a framework which recognizes the importance of identifying the role of 'master institutions' in generating and implementing policy as a crucial nexus in understanding the relationship between race, crime and socio-political structure. It concludes that, despite an apparently innovative policy commitment to concepts of self-determination and control of decision-making by target minority groups, contemporary national policies in this area continue to reproduce earlier ineffective paternalistic and remedial solutions.

Description: This article comments on the Saskatchewan Department of the Attorney-General Budget Review 1983-84, which was leaked to the media in January, 1983. The authors argue that the budget review only analyzes the impact of the justice system in terms of cost effectiveness with little thought being given to "due process or the rights of the poor, women, children and people of Indian ancestry who are the 'clients' of the system." The authors look at crime control versus due process, prevention versus control, and law and order for Indians.

Description: The primary purpose of this study was to compare the opinions of non-Indian Canadian leaders concerning the perceived issues precipitating disproportionate levels of Indian crime and incarceration. The research design involved three stages. The first stage was private clinical interviews with Indian and non-Indian political and professional experts. The second was semi-structured group interviews with Indian and non-Indian leaders. The third involved the development of a survey questionnaire out of the content of the first two stages, and its administration to 100 Indian and non-Indian participants. In addition to providing the perceptions of the two groups, this study provides some theoretical and methodological direction for future opinion research involving Native people. This paper has been released by the Ministry as a user report and is available in English and French.

Description: The objectives of this report include an assessment of the availability, quality, and completeness of existing data sources relating to Native justice issues. To achieve this goal, critical research questions relating to the over-representation of Native people in the criminal justice system were identified and analyzed. Potential research strategies were considered. Existing data sources, at the federal, provincial and other jurisdictional levels, were assessed. Gaps in information were identified. The report deals with both adult inmates in federal institutions, and young offenders. A literature and documentation review is included in the report. An internal working document.

Time Frame: Completed in April, 1985

Description: This study is the culmination of initial feasibility studies on certain aspects of the justice system as they relate to Indians in Saskatchewan. These studies were undertaken by the governments of Canada and Saskatchewan and the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations.
The overall objectives of these studies was to examine the current situation in relation to the circumstances of the Indian people of Saskatchewan and to recommend improvements or modifications that can be made, within the existing constitutional and legal framework, such that the justice system would better reflect Indian concerns, interests, values, and culture. This report deals with four principal areas: law enforcement, corrections, Indian Justices of the Peace and the role of the peacemaker, and customary law. Working groups used research and fieldwork to compile the final report. In this report, each chapter outlines the terms of reference, summarizes the research and fieldwork results of each study, and sets out recommendations.

Description: The report will include an overview of the conditions of registered Indians in several areas including health, education, employment, housing, and justice. It will be comprised primarily of statistical tables. The chapter on justice deals with offender data--admissions, offences, sentence length. Where it is possible, the data on Indians will be compared with the Canadian population so that a clearer picture of differences will emerge. In addition to the Canadian overview, there will be eight provincial reports.

Description: This directory is a comprehensive listing of existing programs and services for women in conflict with the law in Canada. In addition, it includes information on the scope of existing programs and the range of clients served, the state of evaluations of programs and services, and service needs as identified by service providers. Programs which provide direct services are listed, as well as those intended to educate the public about women offenders, and information about groups that lobby on behalf of women in conflict with the law, either on an individual or an issue basis. Although there is not a discreet section dealing with programs for Native women, they are included in the appropriate chapters which divide the programs by provinces. This directory has been released by the Ministry as a user report. It is available in French and English.

Description: The first friendship centre opened in Winnipeg, Manitoba in April, 1959, to meet the needs of Indian and Métis newcomers to that city. Since 1958, the Native friendship centre concept has spread across the country and is still growing. There are seven provincial/territorial associations, and a national centre. In 1972, the federal Secretary of State began core funding friendship centres through its "Migrating Native Peoples Programme." The programme offered by friendship centres differ from one centre to another according to the particular needs of the community. They also provide social programs and act as referral and drop-in centres. As can be seen from this inventory, many of these programs are criminal justice-related.

Description: For the past 13 years, Native Counselling Services of Alberta has been working in the justice system. Because of this, NCSA has become very familiar with the problems Native people experience when they become involved with the justice system. NCSA was created to assist Native people with these difficulties. The main components of NCSA's goal of gaining fair and equitable treatment for Native people involved with the legal system are: 1) to increase the understanding of, and information available to, Native people about the legal and other systems; 2) to increase the understanding of, and information available to, members of the legal system about special circumstances surrounding Native involvement with the legal system; and 3) to do the same for the general community. NCSA does this by providing a number of programs including courtworker programs, a parole program, probation services, minimum security forestry camps, fine options programs, and youth programs. NCSA also has a research department. It gathers, analyzes, and distributes information concerning Native people and the law, thus assisting NCSA in its planning, evaluation, research, and public legal education activities.

SECTION IV

RECORDING PRACTICES ON RACIAL ORIGIN

RECORDING PRACTICES ON RACIAL ORIGIN

In compiling this inventory, one of the objectives was to determine the way in which the racial origin of adults was recorded at the various stages of criminal justice processing. The collection of this information is essential for research purposes as it is virtually impossible to undertake research which will direct policy and program development without knowledge of the availability of data for comparative and other purposes.

We asked police forces, court registries, probation and parole services, and corrections to provide us with information about their recording practices. In all provinces and territories we contacted police departments (in areas with populations over 50,000) and departments with responsibility for court registries, adult and juvenile probation services, and correctional services. Police and correctional services at the federal level were also contacted as were federal prosecutors for the territories.

We present in this section an overview of the recording practices of the various agencies rather than identifying the specific jurisdictions and how they record. The information is presented in the following categories: police, court, probation/parole, and corrections. The information relates to adults.

In attempting to develop "types" or "models" into which the various practices would fit, we found little consistency across the categories except when no designation occurred at all. For this reason, we are compelled to describe the full range of recording practices. As we did not receive responses from all sources, we will indicate the numbers received out of possible totals.

It should be noted that we are not including those practices which do not lead to retrievable information. For example, some police forces may use an internal working form such as a booking sheet and record racial origin. However, as this information is not retrievable, it is not recorded here.

It should also be noted that where racial origin is designated, it is usually done on the basis of self-identification. Only occasionally is it a visual identification on the part of a criminal justice agent.

We hope that the information provided in this section is useful to both researchers and agencies. We realize some of its limitations; for example, we did not systematically elicit information on juveniles.

Finally, we might remind those interested in research and program development to contact federal and provincial ministries directly for further information on recording practices. Additional information may be obtained through annual reports or other public documents.

Police

Of the 27 forces that responded, 11 used a "Native and white" differential; six made "no distinction"; six used a "white/non-white" category; two distinguished on the basis of colour, i.e., red, yellow, black, white; one an Amerindian, Inuit and other category. These differentiations were for official forms.

Courts

Of the 12 courts to which requests for information were sent, 9 responded. None of the responding court registries recorded any information on racial origin. Three had a category for "distinguishing factors" which may or may not include racial origin.

Probation/Parole

Eight of the 12 probation/parole services responded to the request for information. In three jurisdictions there is no racial origin designation; two made a non-Native, Native distinction; another a status Indian, other Native differentiation; one recorded Native people as Métis and non-status, treaty-on-reserve and treaty-off reserve; and one recorded Indian, Inuit, Métis, and other.

Corrections

The recording practices of the federal, provincial and territorial correctional services on intake forms provided the most detail with respect to racial origin. From the 10 services that responded, the following was compiled: only one jurisdiction makes no distinction; one had a code only for reserve of origin; two recorded status Indian, other Native or non-status Indian (of these, one asked the question "Lived on reserve in the past year?"); one used the categories Registered Indian, non-registered Indian, Métis (and had a space to record band and registration number); one recorded American Indian, Inuit, French, English, other; another (1), Indian, Inuit, Métis, other; two categorized by white, black, Native, other; one Amerindian, Inuit, other; and another, Caucasion, North American Indian, Métis, Inuit, Asiatic and black.
